Their food should never be thrown on the ground, but be placed on shallow pans or bits of board which may be easily scraped clean. Three meals a day is sufllcient, for they will thrive better if compelled to go off between whiles and scratch. I find that I get better results from feeding chicks until one month old upon cooked food entirely. Once onlv, I gave some little ones raw dough made of corn meal--came home one evening and found no bread in the house. But next morning I was sorrv I had not let them go snppeiiess to bed, for half of them were dead in their coop a n! the rest were creeping around crying, with tneir poor little crops distended almost to bursting, full of hard, sour dough in a state of fermentation. Seeing that they were alt going to die any way, we cut open the crops of several of them, and alter extracting the dough sewed up the aperture, bnt they too went the way of the rest. After one month old, however, the chicks may be taught to eat dry grains by degrees, though It should always be given them in moderate quantities, with some soft food each meal. Cracked wheat is excellent, but they should never have enough of It to pack their crops tight, as It is liable, like the dough, to swell, ferment, and If not fatal at...
